

EUROPE AS THE EUROPEANS SEE IT

Initial results of an opinion poll carried out in the nine countries of the European Community (September 1973).

Last September the Commission of the European Communities commissioned an opinion poll in the Nine member countries, in order to have a better idea of the attitudes of the general public, and the subjects interesting it, so that it could organize its information policy accordingly.

The poll covered over 13 000 persons aged 15 years or more, consisting of representative samples of the population of each country: between 1900 and 2000 in Germany, France, Britain and Italy, 1500 in the Netherlands, 1300 in Belgium, 1200 in Denmark and Ireland and 300 in Luxembourg.

Eight specialist organizations took part in this international research and guarantee its scientific quality:

International Research Associates (Belgium and Luxembourg)

Gesellschaft für Marktforschung (Germany)

Gallup Markedsanalyse (Denmark)

Institut français d'opinion publique (France)

Social Surveys (United Kingdom)

Irish Marketing Surveys (Ireland)

DOXA (Italy)

Nederlandse Stichting voor Statistiek (Netherlands)

The detailed results will be published later following a very thorough analyse of the breakdown of the results by sex, age, socio-economic and sociocultural characteristics of the interviewees and, more particularly, of the correlation between formation of European attitudes and levels of education, information and political commitment.

Without waiting for those analyses to be completed, the Commission is now publishing the following initial results concerning the answers given in each country to the main questions.

The "old" and "new" Europeans

The initial results confirm that a large part of the general public in the Nine countries is definitely interested in the problems of unifying Europe, but differences become apparent when the Six founder countries of the European Community and Ireland are compared with the United Kingdom and Denmark. The differences concern rather the procedure to be followed in unifying Europe, or what is commonly known - in simplistic terms - as the "Common Market", than the long-term aims of European policy.

Thus in all the Member States, without exception, the majority of interviewees felt that certain problems now being dealt with, such as the major political negotiations with the Americans, Russians, etc., aid to underdeveloped countries, and scientific research, would be better dealt with by a European government than by individual national governments. But the list of these problems is longer in the Six founder countries than in the Three new Member States of the Community; it includes, among others, questions such as the campaign against drugs, military defence, economic growth and environment protection.

Likewise in all the member countries the large majority of the general public feels that: "If one of the countries of the European Community is in serious economic difficulties, the other countries should come to its assistance". Between six and nine people out of ten expressed this feeling of European solidarity: 59% of the British, 62% of the Danes, 77 - 80% of the Germans, Belgians, French, Dutch and Irish, 87 or 88% of the Luxembourgers and Italians.

Of the problems which the European Community is now dealing with, the populations of the Nine countries regard, almost unanimously the same ones as being the most important: modernization of European agriculture, coordination of social policies, elaboration of a common energy policy. Between seven and nine people out of ten regarded all these problems as "very important" or "important". They are followed by regional policy, aid to underdeveloped countries, the introduction of a common foreign policy and the replacement of national currencies by a single European currency.

In favour or hesitant

Although most of the interviewees explicitly agreed with or at least tended to be in favour of the principle itself of unifying Europe and the socio-political and socio-economic aims of that unification there were greater differences in attitudes towards the common market or the Community's present institutions.

Here the Six and Ireland generally agree in expressing a favourable attitude, while in Britain and Denmark a large proportion of public opinion is still very hesitant.

For example, while in the six original countries and in Ireland six or seven people out of ten feel that it is a good idea to belong to the common market, only three British and four Danes out of ten share this opinion.

If the question is posed in more personal terms: "Do you believe that belonging to the common market is a good thing for you personally?" - four or five answers out of ten are favourable in the original countries and in Ireland; compared with two in Britain and three in Denmark.

United Kingdom	31	22
Ireland	56	41
Italy	69	54
Luxembourg	67	42
Netherlands	63	48

(See Tables 4 and 5 in the Annex).

The trend in the Common Market towards the formation of a European political union, decided on in principle by the nine Heads of State or of Government at the Paris Summit Conference in October 1972, receives the approval of 55 - 60% of the Dutch, French and Belgians, 65 - 70% of the Italians, Luxembourgers and Germans, but only 35% of the Irish, 28% of the Danes and 26% of the British.

Roughly 65 - 70% of the Italians, Luxembourgers and Germans, a little over 60% of the Dutch, roughly 50% of the French and Belgians, but only 45% of the Irish, 36% of the Danes and 33% of the British are in favour of the election of a European Parliament by direct universal suffrage.

As these percentages show, the answers given by the interviewees in the six founder countries and even in Ireland range from "very favourable" to "less favourable", whereas in Denmark and Britain the answers to the same questions are on the average unfavourable.

Looking at the last question - the election of a European Parliament by direct universal suffrage - from a different angle, it can be said that it is only in the Netherlands and France that opposition to this is as high as 16 and 18%, while the corresponding percentages in the new member countries are 31% in Ireland, 43% in Denmark and 49% in Britain.

If discussion of national averages is meaningful at all¹, the Irish are generally fairly close to certain founder countries of the European Community (France and Belgium), while the Danes and the British at the bottom of a scale on which the Germans, Luxembourgers, Italians and often the Dutch tend to be at the top.

¹They are given here for convenience, but subsequent analysis will doubtless show that in each country there are sections of the population which are very much in favour and others which are less so or which are even unfavourable, and even that attitudes tend to resemble each other in certain section of the population regardless of national frontiers.

THE TREND IN THE COMMON MARKET TOWARDS THE FORMATION OF A EUROPEAN POLITICAL UNION AND THE ELECTION OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT
BY DIRECT UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE

(total of the answers - "totally in agreement" and "more or less in agreement")

	Political Union	European Parliament
Belgium	58%	52%
Denmark	28	36
Germany	70	69
France	57	51
United Kingdom	26	33
Ireland	35	45
Italy	65	64
Luxembourg	69	67
Netherlands	55	62

(See Tables 6 and 7 in the Annex)

Should the movement towards unification of Europe be speeded up, slowed down or should it continue as now? Some 55% of the Italians and Luxembourgers and nearly 50% of the Germans are in favour of speeding it up. The French, Belgians and Dutch are more hesitant, though less so than the Irish, British and Danes.

Faced with a choice of three answers, the Germans and Italians showed a greater tendency to favour the creation of a sort of European government to which each national government would delegate a large part of its powers; the British, Irish and Danish, on the other hand, are much more strongly attached to their national independence in its present form.

Finally, when called upon to say how attached they were to the principle of unification of Europe when this involved personal sacrifices, of a financial nature for example, the Italians and Germans still headed the list while citizens of the other countries are less in favour; in Denmark and Britain, there is clear opposition.

(See Tables 8, 9 and 10 in the Annex)

Lack of information

Only a small part of the general public shows great interest in questions concerning the European Community: one in ten in Belgium, two in ten in France, Italy, Netherlands and Britain, three in ten in Luxembourg, Ireland, Denmark and Germany.

The interviewees seemed aware of this as the majority of them in most countries feel that they are inadequately informed on these matters: this was the case, for example, of three quarters of the British and Italians; the similarity is curious in that the Italians are generally far more favourable than the British and the British are generally greater consumers of information media than the Italians; the explanation doubtless lies in the fact that two types of person may complain of lack of information: those who are biased in favour and would like to know more, and those who still have not made up their minds on a controversial subject and would like to be better placed to form an opinion.

SECRET//NOFORN//COMINT

Information on the European Community in the press and on television arouses greater interest in Denmark and in Ireland than in the other countries.

The Belgians are the least interested.

The populations of the various countries assessed European information in broadly similar terms: it is "useful", but "complicated"; "too infrequent" but "interesting".

Finally, the general public does not agree on what kind of information it wants. Among those answering this question, most wanted more topical news; only in France did a greater section of the population want more news features and leading articles.
